FROM LITTLE ACORNS GROWS

This is the 16th year of what has become a great American institution—purchasing of United States savings bonds on a mass basis.

It was in 1941 that the government began selling Series E bonds to small investors. It had a twofold objective—to help finance national defense, and to put a brake on inflation by drawing a part of the people's ready funds out of the competition for goods which shortly were to become scarce and in great demand.

The people responded to this opportunity to save small amounts of money, because it was patriotic. Also because it was good business for them.

Now, 16 years later, people are still buying United States savings bonds.It's still patriotic, because the government still has to finance its huge debt. It's still good business for the individual. It's always good business to put aside a part of one's income against a rainy day, or for old age, or for a college education for the youngster, or for ultimate investment in one's own business.

The savings bonds became the biggest thrift program in history. Today 40,000,000 Americans own $40,000,000,000 worth of them.

They helped finance World War II. They helped finance the Korean war. They helped finance government activities of all kinds through the years of deficit spending. And they are still playing a vital role in federal finance even in this time of balanced budgets because the government owes a lot of money and the savings bonds comprise a big slice of the money it owes its citizens.

The people keep buying them even though they can get greater returns on their money elsewhere in these days of raising interest rates. Why do they keep buying them?

For one thing it is such an easy way to save. Small sums, smaller sums than may be put into most other form of investment, are welcome. The greater number of those who buy do so through the "painless" method of payroll deductions at the source of income. But the big reason why people still buy them is because they are the safest investment in the world. Nothing can compare in gilt-edged security with an obligation of the United States government.

The person who invest in United States savings bonds is doing himself a good turn in building himself some capital; is helping his government manage its debt, and is helping us all in that it is anti-inflationary to save instead of spending money in competition for goods.

BOY GETS TRAPPED

East St. Louis, Ill.- When Daniel Wells' dog gave birth to puppies underneath his home, the 9-year-old boy decided to go after them. He became wedged between the house and the ground and neither the efforts of his mother nor or city employees, to dig him out proved successful. They finally got him out by ripping up a section of the bedroom floor. The pups were still under the house.

BOOKS DO NO GOOD

Granite, Okla.- After checking out two books on memory training, Mrs. Charles Bodolph found they didn't work. Three weeks later, she received notice from the library—she had forgotten to return the books.

ACCIDENTAL STAB FATAL

Mountrie, Ga.- Mrs. Bertha Lee Cooper accidentally stabbed herself in the leg while cutting up a chicken and bled to death before reaching medical aid.
